The latter is a matter of different beliefs about a given subject matter, not differences in concepts and in meaning. If they do not share the same brain structures, they cannot share the same mental states and properties. We might then go on to cite this case as a good example of underdetermination of theory by evidence.

An abridged version of this paper was read at the University of Toronto. To describe something as an object of thought is to say that it fulfills a particular role. Conclusion I have argued that natural signs, conceived as entities that intend by their inherent nature, exist; that they belong to the ontological subcategory of simple, monadic properties; and that every state of awareness has such an entity as a constituent.

I doubt that all ideas are images in this sense, but I will not argue this. Radio
