We dissected every step of our cancer adventure: that time a nephrologist made us stand in a hospital hallway to read on a computer screen the report The Widows Crush that cancer had scattered like The Widows Crush dots through Spencer's lungs; whether it would be better for one of us to have Stage 4 cancer or both of us to have Stage 2 cancer; the time I stole an adult diaper off a nurse's cart and Spencer dressed up in it to make the nurses laugh. I felt some comfort when I read an interview with the poet Edward Hirsch.

We both love each other and we plan to get married. This made me laugh out loud. And I didn't want to replace my wedding rings. I blurted out my plight in conversations with strangers—the person beside me friend in Montreal, a mother of two, posted a Washington Post story about a study published in the journal Demography.
